

Genetic duplications and amplifications are important mutations contributing to increased virulence and antibiotic resistance in pathogens, cancer and many diseases in humans, and new gene formation in all organisms. This talk will focus on past and current experiments using bacterial model systems to study these common yet elusive mutations.